BedAvailability.com Reinvents its Patent Pending Interactive Website

Mission Viejo, California 1/30/2008 10:18 PM GMT (TransWorldNews)

BedAvailability.com is launching its newest version of its website to assist care professionals and the public with the discharge and admission of seniors into care facilities and communities. The owners of BedAvailability.com have gathered feedback from industry insiders over the last two years to create what they feel is the state-of-the-art website. "The site is so unique that we had to file for Federal Patent protection," states Stuart Furman, CFO, and a practicing estate planning attorney. Laura Ferrall, President and owner of the Eldercare Training Academy, continues, "The interactive nature of the website puts the control of the senior admissions back into the hands of the loved one's family at a time of crisis. Families can also use the site to do their research on facilities in a much more efficient manner as the information is presented to the user in a very logical format."

The "inquiry board" creates rapid confidential communication between facilities and the families to better locate a suitable facility for the elder.

In-service presentations are currently being scheduled to re-introduce the website to the care professionals. Additionally, the company is now seeking industry service providers, professionals and product vendors to participate in its sponsor and advertising program.

Laura Ferrall concludes, "The best part of the website is that the basic service for facilities is free and the public and care professionals also have free use of the website features. Simply there is no reason not to register and be part of this innovative system."
